Weak, Cold Spells.

Wilmington, N. C.—Mrs. Cora L. Ritter, of this place, says: "I used to have headaches, and blind dizzy spells, and weak cold spells went all over me. I had different doctors, but they were unable to tell me what was wrong, so I began to take Cardui. I am now alright, in good health, and better than I have been for 10 years." Cardui is a remedy for women, which has been helping sick women for nearly a life time. You can absolutely rely upon it. Other people have done the testing and you should profit by their experience. Cardui has benefited a million women. Why not you? Begin taking Cardui today.

THE TEMPEST

Mrs. Joyce had been suffering all day with one of her severe headaches. Also a neighbor had called and had taken three hours to tell that she had seen another neighbor's husband walking with a blonde person that she just knew must be his stenographer. Also Johnnie had fallen through the ice, and in her nervousness in getting him to bed she had spilled a cup of tea on her best down quilt.

Taking everything into account, she felt that she had had a pretty bad day, but she bore patiently all through the dinner Joyce's rapid fire conversation and his bubbling good humor. It was only when the meal was over and her husband whistled the chorus of "Yip-I-Addy" five times in five different keys, each one shriller than the one before, that she raised her hands and said, "Louie, please stop that awful noise."

"Noise?" exclaimed Joyce, surprised. "Why, my dear, don't you feel well?"

"No, I don't, but a person might feel well and still not care for your whistling."

"What is it—another of your beastly headaches? It must be pretty bad. I used to be called a fine whistler."

"Then you must have been raised in a very untruthful community."

"Now I know your headache must be awful. You are looking mighty mean, too."

"Go ahead and abuse me as much as you please. I suppose I can stand it." Mrs. Joyce was beginning to feel very badly treated.

Joyce looked at his wife in astonishment. Then he tried again. "What is the matter? Is your mother coming?"

"Louie Joyce!" If she had imagined before that she had cause for anger she knew it now. "I know you do not care for poor dear mamma, but that is no reason why you should think I will sit by and let you talk of her as you please."

"Why, for the love of Pete, what did I say about your mother? I only asked if she was coming again. Yes, know you were all tired out and worried the last time she sent word she was coming." Joyce was getting discouraged, but he was determined to make peace if possible.

"No, mamma is not coming. Now, go ahead and grin. You might at least have manners enough to conceal your pleasure at the news. You are just as cruel as you can be, and—"

"For goodness sake ring off, Esther!" Joyce was getting irritated.

"Yes, yes, that's right. Get slangy and insulting. I'll try to bear it." Mrs. Joyce was feeling like a martyr.

"You'll try to bear it? What have you to bear?"

"Oh, nothing. Of course you are an angel, and I suppose I am the reverse."

"Yes, that's about right," acquiesced Joyce, trying desperately to get a smile from her. "Everybody says—"

"So you have been discussing me, have you? Oh, you are cruel! I'm going back to mamma this very night!" Mrs. Joyce rushed from the room.

Joyce followed in a leisurely way. He found her in her room, throwing her clothing around on the bed and chairs.

"Here, let me help you." Then Joyce, with a twinkle in his eye, which his wife did not see because she persistently refused even to glance at him, began placing her things carefully, neatly and quickly in her trunk.

Mrs. Joyce gazed in horror for a minute at his back as he stooped over the trunk. Then she turned with apparent indifference, but with a smothered sob, and walked to the dresser. There with painstaking carelessness she powdered her nose with sachet powder.

Joyce grinned expansively into the trunk. Then he turned and said seriously: "Well, she's packed and I'll ship her in the morning."

He went over and helped his wife put on her coat and followed her nonchalantly down the stairs and to the door.

He had felt all along that his wife did not really mean to go, but now, as she put her hand on the knob, he became apprehensive. As she opened the door and was about to pass out he felt a quick pain at his heart that took his breath for a minute. For it dawned on him in a flash that he had been cruel. His wife had been sick and he had teased and angered her instead of sympathizing with her. In an instant he was all contrition. He reached out and took the door knob from her fingers and, drawing her inside, closed the door.

Mrs. Joyce looked into his eyes and what she saw there broke down her pride and opened the flood gates. Somehow—she never could tell just how—she was in his arms, her head on his shoulder, crying unrestrainedly, while he was soothing and petting her in his tenderest way.

When the worst of the storm had passed, she looked up and said: "Oh, Louie, you didn't care a bit about my going, and it hurt so!"

"Why, you little goose," he replied, "I was scared stiff, but I was wearing my poker face."

Then Mrs. Joyce buried her nose in his neck and said in a little shamed voice: "You've got the smallest test of any man I know."
